Connecting to People Affected by the Quake

By THE NEW YORK TIMES

Update | 3:48 p.m., Thursday, Jan. 14 Readers can also submit photographs of missing friends and relatives in Haiti here. Again, if you have received information about a missing loved one, please leave another comment below.

Update | 6:51 p.m. Readers can keep trying to obtain information about friends and family in Haiti through this blog post. In addition, please leave another comment if your efforts were successful. (Only include personal information like telephone numbers and e-mail addresses if deemed necessary.)

Update | 10:56 a.m. The State Department has added a hot line for those trying to contact relatives in Haiti: 1 (888) 407-4747.

The powerful earthquake that struck Haiti on Tuesday knocked out telephones and electricity in the capital, Port-au-Prince, adding to the fears of many Haitian expatriates and family members who could not contact the people they knew in the country.

The New York Times would like to connect people inside and outside Haiti who are searching for information about the situation on the ground. Readers outside Haiti who have friends and relatives in the country, along with readers in Haiti who are still able to access the Internet, can use the comments section below as a forum to share updates. Some readers may be searching for the same family members.

Have you been able to reach loved ones in the area affected by the earthquake? What have you learned from people there?

If you haven't been able to contact those in the region, what information do you have about the people you'd like to hear from? Please include as much detail as possible.
