

Abstract: The Arctic is experiencing dramatic and visible warming, forcing the US Coast Guard to rethink its operations and strategy in this key region. As warming has occurred in the Arctic, have US security interests in the region gained greater strategic significance? Have strategic priorities in the Arctic shifted tangibly, and if so, how? How has the Coast Guard grappled with the emergence of climate change, and how has scientific data about warming been translated into policy choices and strategic decisions?