

Twitter Abstract

Similar to the correlations between particular words and overall happiness that have been established in English, we have asked individual people to rate the happiness of words in languages such as Polish, Spanish, Russian and Japanese, so we can begin to develop a global hypothesis about the fundamental nature of language and happiness. We can also look for correlations between language structures and happiness and hopefully produce findings like that of our positive bias hypothesis for the English language.