This thesis is an investigation of the behavioral and mental health needs and social service needs and the services available to the refugee community in the Burlington area. It will explore the current status of what services these organizations provide how they provide them. The primary focus of this research will be on service providers’ perceptions of the refugee community’s behavioral and mental health needs and social service needs. In this thesis, I seek to understand how local service providers’ determine what services and support the refugee community needs, as well as what perceptions these providers have of the services they provide. Furthermore, this thesis will look at how these providers think the refugee community perceives and uses their services Moreover, this thesis will examine what the providers think is working well in terms of meeting these needs and/or what isn’t working to meet these needs. Additionally, this thesis project will analyze any perceived barriers to and gaps in meeting these needs. Finally, this thesis aims to identify potential strategies for overcoming barriers to and gaps in meeting the needs of the local refugee community. Through ethnographic research, participant observation and interviews, I aim to identify any similarities and differences across the perceptions of service providers who work with the refugee community in the Burlington area.
