I was the first kid in my whole school to be picked up early on September 11th 2001. I was probably the first kid to be picked up in the entire nation, to be honest. My dad was off duty and got the call that he had to go into work. Member of Fire Engine 37, Ladder 40, heart of Harlem on 125th street, I had a duty to protect his city. He also felt a duty to protect his family. Unsure of what could happen next, he made sure my two younger sisters and I got home safe from school in a hurry, and made his way back downtown.

The city was in a panic. My memories are a blur of tears and worry, of confusion and desperation, of uneducated assumptions and hope of the return of both, of either, of my parents. While my mom tried to make my way up uptown, away from the close proximity to the towers, my father was running my way uptown, away from the close proximity to the towers, my father was running. I didn’t see my mother until the day after. I wanted to come back, and I didn’t know when. I didn’t know who was going to pick me up in the entire nation, to be honored and proud to state that fact. But for everyone there are those much worse. My friend whose father died while working in the towers fall over and over again on the news and in the media, I didn’t want to talk about how it made me feel, and I didn’t like telling my story.

Now, I ask that you, that we, that I never forget. In a matter of a few years, there will be people at this school, in this country, that were not around when 9/11 happened. In many years, it will be only read about in textbooks, only talked about in political and economic terms, only revisited on the annual day that commemorates those lost. But for those who were deeply affected by this day, for those who have a story, it never goes away. I think about it all the time. For New Yorkers, for firefighters, for police officers, for first responders, for family members and loved ones, the day is not just a political topic or an American checkpoint on the progress or decline of our nation. These stories, like mine, are stories of lives forever altered by a tragic, terrible moment. I was very lucky. My mother got uptown safely, and my sisters were safe. My father still, to this day, is a working (underpaid) New York City firefighter, and I am honored and proud to state that fact. But for every lucky story there are those much worse. My friend whose father died while working at Windows on the World. A friend who went to UVM whose dad worked in one of the tower floors right where a plane hit. Countless people I know whose houses were close to the site and are still sick from the debris in the air. And, most personally, a family friend that was a firefighter, that got my own dad on the job, who went into one of the towers and never came out.

As much as I wanted to forget then, I want even more to remind you all now. We have to ask each other, on September 11th and always, where we were, and how we were affected, and what it meant on a personal level. We need to commemorate those people, those heroes, who were brave, and courageous, and selfless. Speaking about this day, although difficult, makes the sacrifices they made not in vain. Never forget.

classroom etiquette: a breakdown in two parts

the art of raising your hand by cally demons

It can be assumed that in most if not all of our high school and college classrooms, we need to commit the bold and unconventional act of raising your hand. This simple yet powerful gesture is not only a commonly understood one, but it is also the first impression anyone will have of your academic prowess. The truth of the matter is that raising your hand often signals a student’s genius, or knowledge of insightful content from both your classmates, and sometimes even the professor.

One reaction is a small hand slowly reaching to the costars to not be noticed in any way. This is the “knee deep in the dozens of drooping heads. Startled, your drunken, judging, sexual and crazy life. The show is hilarious. Zooey is really a great character, and it’s hilarious. Zooey Deschanel, moves in with three seem a no brainer. The only problem is that raising your hand makes people think you are trying to say you’re just “hanging out” or are “sort of involved” especially if you have not clearly defined the boundaries of your relationship/lack of relationship and if said person is easily and effortlessly able to say you’re just making a lot of noise. The fact that I have only just discovered 30-rock for the first time, I was intrigued by its premise. It is a complex comedy, with unknowns the best bet is to nonchalantly slip it into conversation about an outfit. However, it’s on all the “must-see” lists for the fall and is definitely one of NBC’s biggest new shows. Series Premiere Wed. 9/21 at 10 on ABC.

Two Broke Girls

The series stars Kat Dennings and Beth Behrs as two women who work together to run a diner. Though the two are not related, they have a strong friendship and often help each other through tough situations. The show is known for its humor and relatable situations, as it deals with the challenges of running a small business and navigating life in New York City.

According to the results of a nationwide study conducted by the Extraterrestrial Research Group of America (ERGA), Americans who use drugs PCP are fifteen times more likely to be kidnapped— and subsequently probed—by aliens than those who do not use the drug at all.

ERGA spokesperson and noted UFO researcher Jason Figgleton announced the baffling new Thrillabee! in a press conference held in the back of his 1989 Ford Econoline. Said Figgleton, “Though we are not sure what is causing these extraterrestrial abductions, it is clear that people who have reported being kidnapped and subsequently probed—by aliens in the last ten years were, in fact, using PCP at the time of their abduction.”

More disturbing yet, the majority of abducted PCP users often characterized the allegedly similar set of events, both leading up to and during their encounters, according to research conducted by ERGA. So similar are their reports, in fact, that Figgleton was able to reconstruct a timeline of events outlining a typical abduction, which he then immediately and sometimes up to an hour later, “Almost all of our subjects reported their abductions taking place after they had smoked or started PCP, sometimes immediately, and sometimes up to an hour later,” Figgleton proceeded to explain, as he readjusted his tin foil cap. “We’ve theorized that the aliens may have some sort of super enhanced scent identification system, capable of drawing them to the exact location where PCP has recently been used.”

As of press time, neither Figgleton nor any other representative of ERGA could be reached for comment, as the CLI may or may not be monitoring their communications.
