Using status updates collected from Twitter's gardenhose feed, we explore population-level happiness. We employ a simple real time hedonometer that is effective on large quantities of text. Many Twitter users enable geo-location of their tweets. For these users, we explore the relationship between their location, average movement, and happiness.